

How Twofold works

1. Set it down between you

Twofold has no present button. Hold the phone and it is yours alone; lay it flat on the table and it splits at the crease, because that is what setting a document down in front of someone already means. The posture is the command.

2. One document, two views

Your half shows the page as printed, with your private notes and the things you meant to say. Their half shows one clause at a time, set large enough to read across a table. They are not two copies kept in sync. There is one position in the document, drawn twice.

3. Their language, not only yours

Choose what your client reads before you sit down, and each clause reaches them in Hindi, Tamil, Bengali or Marathi while you keep the original wording in front of you. It happens on the phone. The document is never uploaded anywhere.

4. Read it out loud

Translation helps someone who reads their own language. A great many people read no language at all, and they sign these documents too. Press Read and the clause is spoken in the language your client reads, slowly, on this device.

5. They can ask

Every other control on this screen is yours. The one on their half is theirs: a quiet button that tells you they would like a clause explained. The clauses they asked about are written onto the signed copy, so the record shows what was actually discussed.

6. What they never see

Your notes, your talk track, your other clients and your document library stay on your half. That is not a matter of care while presenting. The type describing their half has nowhere to put a private note, so no future change can leak one there by accident.

7. Signing

When you are ready, their half becomes a signature line and nothing else. The signed copy carries the time, the clauses they asked about, and a fingerprint of the document as it was shown, so anyone can check later that the pages signed were the pages presented.

8. It is not only insurance

Nothing here is about policies. A loan officer and a borrower, a doctor taking consent, a landlord and a tenant, an employer and someone signing an offer: whenever one person understands a document and the other is signing it, the two halves have work to do.
